AVOID A DISASTER AFTER A DISASTER

What is an Assignment of Benefits?

An assignment of benefits, also known as an "AOB", is an agreement that a repair service provider may ask you, the insurance policyholder, to sign after you have suffered a property loss, such as damage from a water pipe break. This agreement often transfers your insurance policy benefits and rights to that person or company, who might be a plumber, roofer, general contractor or water remediation company.

How it works...

A repair service provider may require you to sign the "AOB" agreement in order for them to get paid for their work, and so that you will bear no cost and you will not have to be involved in the claim process.

What's the catch?

The consequences of signing an AOB can be harmful to you the insured. This signed form can transfer not only the policyholder's benefits but all other rights under the policy to the repair service provider, leaving you out of the claim process and without right to file suit in the event of a dispute.

You may not obtain the necessary repairs to your property. Liens could be placed on your property for unpaid repair bills. Signing the AOB prohibits you from having a voice during the claim process leaving the insurance company negotiating the claim with the third party. Take control of your claim and communicate with your insurance company during the life of the claim.

Contractors may Place liens on your Property

A contractor has the right to enforce their claim for payment against your property, even with a signed Assignment of Benefits. This means that they may place a lien on your property if they are not fully compensated for the work that was contracted. It is imperative that you know what work is being done and the cost of that work before repairs begin. If a contractor fails to pay their subcontractors for materials or labor, the subcontractors may also have the right to place a lien against your property.
